"Rotfl",

"That's from emedia, circa 2005. They made their money off the last 1/3 of companies that still could not figure out the Internet. Some of the older domainers are much more colorful. One domainer from the 1990s still sits on good domain names today, and will sue you if you inquire about a domain price but later refuse negotiations. (I use tor only to scrape his site.) The spamhaus rokso list also has pictures of spammers, some dressed as clowns (literally). One domainer had his cat on the board of directors. Perhaps the earlier people are into new technology, the more likely they are eccentric.   Domaining today is all boring (except for the criminal fronts; those guys still keep things fun).",

"There's a news story (not well sourced) suggesting Macron's team self-poisoned some docs with Russian metadata, obvious false documents. Those who steal the documents must now act as journalists, and find the fakes before dumping all. Else, if all the stolen docs are dumped, the victim can just point to the Russian metadata and discredit even the true damaging information. The costs of filtering/editing are considerable (dozens of staffers, minimum) and of course all the leak sites famously don't do any of this.
